

THE STILL POINT

Finding the Center Between All Opposites

A Contemplative Practice Document of the Global Stewardship Council

by Gaynor Kim-Sing, Founder

Published under Creative Commons Zero (CC0) — Public Domain Dedication

github.com/GlobalStewardship2026/global-stewardship-charter-2026-public-review

Credit and Origin

This document draws its animating teachings — the still point between polarities, electromagnetic frequency as the currency of inner life, the physical body as a vessel for expanding capacity, the arc from curiosity to embodied knowing, the discipline of a repeatable frequency, the practice of childlike openness, and the ethic of never dismissing another's belief — from the teaching and public interviews of Taoist Master San Qing, an ordained priest and lineage holder within the Taoist tradition, and founder of The Way 126.

San Qing's teaching can be explored directly through his own platforms:

The Way 126 (official site): <https://theway126.com>

The Way 126 Experience (YouTube channel): <https://www.youtube.com/@theway126experience>

The wording throughout this document is an original synthesis and secular restatement for the Global Stewardship Council; it is not a transcript or verbatim reproduction of San Qing's spoken teaching. Readers who wish to engage with his teaching in his own words are warmly directed to the sources above and to his published work. No commercial product, app, or paid offering of The Way 126 is endorsed by the Global Stewardship Council; only the underlying contemplative principles are carried forward here.

Executive Summary

There is a place inside every person that does not move. It is untouched by the noise of the day, unmoved by fear, anger, or grief. It sits at the exact center between opposites — between the in-breath and the out-breath, between expansion and contraction, between the poles that most of us spend our lives being pulled between. Taoist tradition calls this center the Wu Ji: the void before form, the ground from which all things arise.

This document offers a practical, secular pathway into that center. It treats the body as an instrument that can be tuned, treats emotion as a form of energetic currency worth spending with intention, and treats stillness — not effort — as the doorway to clarity and right action.

From the Global Stewardship Council perspective, a steward who cannot find their own still point cannot reliably hold the line on Respect, Balance, Coherence, Consciousness, Wisdom, Justice, and Truth under pressure. The capacity to pause — between provocation and reaction, between impulse and decision — is the same capacity this document proposes as a foundation for individual practice and, at civilizational scale, for the deliberate pauses this Council has advocated in AI-assisted nuclear decision-making and other high-stakes governance.

1. The Still Point — The Center Between All Opposites

1.1 The Principle

Every experience arrives as a pair of opposites: joy and sorrow, expansion and contraction, action and rest. The habit of the mind is to grasp one pole and push away the other. The older teaching is different: both poles are expressions of one underlying unity, and the work is not to defeat one side but to find the center where both are held without strain.

That center — sometimes named the Wu Ji, the void, or simply the still point — is not empty in the sense of being absent. It is full in the sense of being the source. It is the place where duality resolves, where the pendulum stops swinging, and from which new intention can be seeded cleanly.

1.2 Practice: Between the Breath

Step	Action
1	Sit comfortably. Close your eyes. Let the breath move naturally.
2	Bring attention to the pause between the in-breath and the out-breath.
3	Rest in that pause without forcing it. Simply notice it is there.
4	In that gap there is no inhale and no exhale — only stillness. This is the still point.
5	From this still point, a clear intention tends to take root more cleanly than one set amid mental noise.
6	Two to five minutes of daily practice is enough for the pause to become a familiar doorway.

2. Electromagnetism — The Currency of Inner Life

2.1 The Principle

Thought, emotion, physical health, and relationship all move through the body's electrical and magnetic activity — the heart's field, the brain's impulses, the nervous system's signalling. Framed simply: what you feel is what you are broadcasting, and what you broadcast shapes what comes back to you. Treating an inner state as a form of currency — something spent, not merely experienced — encourages a more deliberate relationship with fear, anger, and resentment, and a more deliberate investment in calm, love, and creative focus.

2.2 Practice: The Currency Check

Question	Purpose
What am I broadcasting right now?	Identify the current expenditure
What is this likely to attract or reinforce?	Trace the pattern forward
Is this how I want to spend this energy?	Make the choice conscious
What would I rather be broadcasting?	Redirect the investment

3. The Container — The Body as Vessel

3.1 The Principle

Every person begins with a certain working capacity — call it life force, working energy, or simply baseline vitality. Most people operate well under their potential capacity. Steady practice — rest, breath work, clearing unresolved emotional charge, heart-centered coherence — expands that capacity over time. This is not purely metaphorical: sustained practice measurably changes stress resilience and available energy.

The common failure mode, especially among people doing service-oriented or emotionally demanding work, is leaking energy faster than it is replenished. The task is not only to generate more energy but to expand the container so energy can be sustained rather than burned through.

3.2 Practice: The Container Check

End-of-day question
Did I end today with energy, or did I feel drained?
Where did I leak energy today — which people, thoughts, activities, or media?
Where did I gain energy today?
What is one way to expand capacity tomorrow?

4. The Seeker's Progression — From Curiosity to Knowing

4.1 The Principle

Growth on any path tends to move through a recognizable arc: curiosity opens the door, curiosity that is rewarded becomes hope, hope tested by real experience hardens into belief, and belief lived long enough becomes knowing — no longer something one holds, but something one simply is. No stage is inferior to another; each is a necessary foothold for the next.

4.2 Practice: The Progression Map

Stage	What it tends to feel like
Curiosity	"I wonder if there is more to this. I'm not sure, but I'm interested."
Hope	"I've seen enough to think this might be real. I want to explore further."
Belief	"I've had enough experience now that I'm committed to this path."
Knowing	"I no longer need to believe it. It is simply part of how I move through the world."

Worth mapping honestly across a few domains — spiritual practice, health, relationships, purpose — since most people are further along in some areas than others, and that unevenness is normal rather than a failure.

5. Hold the Line of Resonance — A Standard for Manifestation Work

5.1 The Principle

A single peak experience — a flash of insight, a moment of unusual peace — is meaningful but not yet mastery. The working standard is repeatability: a state that can only be summoned once is closer to a pleasant accident than a discipline. The practice is to stabilize a frequency of mind until it becomes a default rather than an exception.

5.2 Practice: The Resonance Check

Question
Can I access this state reliably, or only on rare occasions?
What disrupts it — stress, fatigue, specific people, specific environments?
What supports it — practice, nature, community, rest?
What is one concrete step today toward stabilizing it?

6. A Daily Blessing — On the Practice of Spoken Invocation

Spoken blessing and invocation are ancient and cross-cultural practices — a short spoken form, often repeated three times, that affirms unity of body and spirit, calls what is above into alignment with what is grounded here, and closes with gratitude for the capacity to create. San Qing offers such a blessing in his own teaching, passed to him within his lineage; out of respect for that lineage and its authorship, this document does not reproduce his specific wording. Readers drawn to this practice are encouraged to hear it directly from the source (see the links above) or to compose their own short invocation built on the same three movements: unify, align, give thanks.

7. The Childlike Nature — A Gateway to Possibility

7.1 The Principle

Children tend to accept what is presented to them before deciding whether it is possible. Adults typically do the reverse: they decide what is possible first, then filter experience through that decision. The teaching here is not naivety but the deliberate, temporary suspension of that filter — approaching a practice as though the limiting belief about it had never been installed.

7.2 Practice: The Childlike Inquiry

Step	Action
1	Name one area where you feel stuck or limited.
2	Ask: if I had never been told this was impossible, what would I try?
3	Ask: what would a child simply assume was true here?
4	Try one small thing from that stance, without over-analyzing it first.

8. Never Dismiss Another's Belief

8.1 The Principle

Every person is somewhere on their own arc from curiosity to knowing. Dismissing someone else's belief — because it looks less evolved, more dogmatic, or less spiritual than one's own — quietly dismisses the validity of one's own path too, since both are just further along the same kind of journey. This is a discipline of tolerance rather than an argument for relativism about facts; it applies to how one holds another person's meaning-making, not to abandoning one's own standards of evidence.

8.2 Practice: The Tolerance Check

Question
Am I dismissing this belief mainly because it differs from mine?
Where might this person be on their own curiosity-to-knowing arc?
Can I honor their path while staying grounded in my own?

Closing: Stillness as Infrastructure

A practice of finding the still point is not separate from the work of policy and diplomacy — it is a precondition for doing that work well. The same capacity to pause between provocation and reaction that a daily breath practice builds in a single person is, at civilizational scale, the same capacity this Council has argued for in the form of mandatory deliberation windows before AI-assisted nuclear decisions, and in the insistence that consciousness quality itself — how clearly and calmly a mind can attend to what matters — is a measurable variable in governance, not an afterthought to it.

This document is offered in that spirit: as a personal practice that, multiplied across enough stewards, becomes part of the infrastructure of a more coherent world.

Global Stewardship Council · Respect · Balance · Coherence · Consciousness · Wisdom · Justice · Truth